Market and Migrants: Redefining China's Urban Social Welfare System

Following 30 years of reform, there are now high degrees of inequality, unemployment and disparities among China's provinces, creating a new class of urban poor. The costs and benefits of China's spectacular economic growth have not been evenly distributed.

by Geeta KOCHHAR ..... 193

Environmental Issues and Policy Priorities in China: A Content Analysis of Government Documents

Despite China's increasingly vigorous efforts to curb pollution over the past several decades, it has not been successful in preventing overall deterioration of environmental quality. Some issues are prioritised and actively pursued while some receive little attention and many are seldom or never mentioned.

by Xibing HUANG, Dingtao ZHAO, Colin G. BROWN, Yanrui WU and Scott A. WALDRON ..... 220

The Effects of China's Tourism Diplomacy and a "United" Front

Through its outbound tourists, China markets its culture and values, projects a peaceful image and demonstrates its superpower capabilities, wealth, confidence and determination to globalise. China has successfully maximised the political leverage afforded by outbound tourism but also tightly controls it.

by FAN Shih-Ping ..... 247

Administrative Monopoly, Market Economy and Social Justice: An Anatomy of the Taxi Monopoly in Beijing

Administrative monopoly is the result of non-economic reasons including the legal monopoly granted by law and the monopoly formed from administrative interference, mainly in restricting market entry, imposing local protectionist measures and fixing prices. The case of the taxi monopoly in Beijing is a problem of the market, not one caused by the market.

by Jiefen LI ..... 282

Facts and Impacts of FDI on China and the World Economy

At the launch of the economic reforms in 1978, the Chinese government was faced with shortages of foreign exchange, outdated technologies and limited production capacities. Thus, it decided to use foreign direct investment to offset capital deficiency, acquire advanced technology and promote exports.

comments and notes

A Chinese Way of Democratisation?

Since the launch of the reforms, the Chinese government has retreated somewhat from society. People have a fair chance at maximising their potential. The controlled nature of Chinese democratisation suggests a long and gradual path to full democracy, requiring numerous adaptations on the part the Communist Party and the country.

by Yang YAO ..... 330

Alternative Property Systems for China

Many western economists are encouraging China to grant western-style property rights to agricultural lands. Yet, the government must proceed cautiously because land may become more concentrated in the hands of the rich and many farmers could become destitute if they sell their farms. A property rights system with Chinese characteristics is the solution.

by Jonathan E. LEIGHTNER ..... 346

“To Walk Out”: Rural Parents’ Views on Education

Most parents raising children in China’s rural areas today go to great lengths to try to help their children leave the poverty of rural life. Education is not only desirable but seen as a requirement for survival in modern China.

by Peggy A. KONG ..... 360

Two Chinese Commentators on the Slow Progress towards a Law on Religions

It is not essential to have a law on religions. Not every country has such a law. But the way in which China’s legal system is being developed means that such a law is needed to provide a clear framework for administrative regulation, and to provide some basic protection for believers. This law needs to be flexible enough to cope with some changing realities in China.
